Guide to Geotechnical Instruments, 2004/11/24 1 Reasons for Installing Instrumentation Introduction Geotechnical instrumentation provides data that helps engineers in every stage of a project. Here are the main reasons that instrumentation is used: Site Investigations Instruments are used to characterize initial site conditions. Common

Guide to Geotechnical Instrumentation - durhamgeo.com

Although field instrumentation cannot guarantee good design or trouble free construction, but it can be useful in monitoring the construction procedures, installing the early warning systems, and can provide useful input in forensic geotechnical studies. One of the main purposes of instrumentation installed within an earth dam is to study the Field Instrumentation Geotechnical projects often present the ultimate measurement challenge, in part because of their initial lack of definition and the sheer scale of the problem; often a number of instrumentation types is required. The ultimate goal is to select the most sensitive measurement parameters with respect to the project objectives.

The focus of this Geotechnical Analysis and Design Section is to present methods and guidelines for developing design parameters for Geotechnical Design, Construction and Maintenance Support. Development of this manual section relied heavily on the Washington State DOT Geotechnical Design Manual for organization and content.

An Instrumentation Engineer provides the technical support for a Departmental Geotechnical Engineer in obtaining vital information from a geotechnical instrumentation program that is used to design reliable and efficient projects. Therefore, field instrumentation is vital to the practice of geotechnical engineering.
